An increase from three and one-half nillion gallons of the oil of coal tar mported into the city of New York in 1904, to an amount estimated to be almost twenty-five million gallons last year, is one of the indications pointing to the progress of the nation wide movement for the conservation of forest resources. It is creosote which the government and scores of corporations and private wood users have found to be one of the most satisfactory presedvatives of railroad ties, mine props, telephone and telegraph poles, fence posts, and for timbers used for other commercial purposes. Lengthening the life of timber in use means the lessening of the drain on the country's forests, and what is more important to the average business man, it means the saving of thousands of dollars annually spent so unmistakable that they leave no ground for doubt. Sick kidneys ex-crete a thick, cloudy, offensive urine, for the labor of the frequent renewals made necessary when untreated timber is used. Ten years ago the strongest advo-cates of the creosoting method of preserving wood could scarcely have hop-ed for the present advanced state of this industry. Creosoting is becoming the acknowledged standard means of increasing the life of timbers.

Formerly the production of creosote from both coal tar and wood tar, far exceeded any demand for wood treat-ing purposes. However, the number of wood-preserving plants has grown so rapidly within the last four years that this country is not now able to supply its own demand for coal tar
